

Justified text

Set word by word, so it works with an embedded family too.

Ragged right

A PDF has no line breaking of its own: every line is placed at a coordinate by whoever writes the file. Justifying means measuring the words, dividing what is left of the measure between the gaps, and setting each word at its own position — which is why it works with an embedded face, whose widths come from the font rather than from a table of assumptions.

A PDF has no line breaking of its own: every line is placed at a coordinate by whoever writes the file. Justifying means measuring the words, dividing what is left of the measure between the gaps, and setting each word at its own position — which is why it works with an embedded face, whose widths come from the font rather than from a table of assumptions.

The last line of a paragraph is left ragged. Stretching four words across a full measure is what makes justified text look like a ransom note.
